Question	Answer	Location	Explain
31	plants	Its principal source of nutrition is plants which are either already dead or in the process of rotting, a characteristic it shares with a number of other species of snail. Because of this, its normal habitat is similar to other land snails, and it can be seen in urban settings such as gardens as well as uncultivated areas.	- Đáp án là plants - “plants... dead or rotting” → khớp “dead or decaying ...” - Đây là thức ăn chính của ốc - Key word: + plants (n): thực vật + rotting (adj): đang phân hủy

Part 4. You will hear an ecologist giving a presentation on research on a type of snail. First you have some time to look at questions 31 to 40. Now listen carefully and answer questions 31 to 40.

Good afternoon. The topic I've chosen for my presentation is a snail. Snails belong to a group of animals called mollusks, soft-bodied creatures normally protected by a hard shell.

Today I'm going to talk about a particular example, the white-lipped grove snail, and the research which is being done into it.

I'll start by giving some background information about this variety. The white-lipped snail lives on land and is air-breathing. Its shell is easy to recognise because of its clear stripe, but it varies considerably in colour from pale pink to yellow. The snail gets its rather strange name from the fact that it has a white edge, or lip, to its shell. Its principal source of nutrition is plants which are either already dead or in the process of rotting, a characteristic it shares with a number of other species of snail.

Because of this, its normal habitat is similar to other land snails, and it can be seen in urban settings such as gardens as well as uncultivated areas. A final point about its ecology is that it also needs calcium and other minerals to keep it healthy. To get these, it frequently consumes soil, which contains these minerals.

So far, nothing I've said would seem to set this variety apart from other land-dwelling, air-breathing snails. However, as long ago as the early 19th century, naturalists observed that these white-lipped snails appeared to live in two strikingly separate areas, many hundreds of miles apart, namely Ireland and the Pyrenees, the large mountain range on the border of France and Spain. But what is most surprising is that there was no record of the variety being found anywhere in between these places, so the distribution seemed very strange.

This age-old puzzle has intrigued a group of present-day researchers at the University of Nottingham, and they've decided to undertake a detailed study to investigate the strange distribution
